SECTION ONE : READING COMPREHENSION (7 points)

Read the passage carefully then answer the questions.

1 We can say with complete certainty that all world governments are concerned with population growth. This important topic has been and will always be the subject of many national and international debates. No wonder then that Algeria has been one of the world's nations to focus its attention on demography and work diligently to create a balance between its people and its resources.

2 A lecturer indicated that prior to 1750 the population growth rate was rather stagnant because birth rates almost equalled the mortality rates. And because famines, wars and plagues were pervasive, people compensated for the losses with more frequent births.

3 As the 'health revolution' developed, the mortality rate went down and the birth rate went up. Consequently, in 1800, world population was at the one billion level, and the rhythm did not go down until we reached five billion human beings in July of 1987. The disparity of distribution is another problem: one third of the world population lives in developed countries, whereas the remaining two thirds populate the rest of the planet, which represents the poorer part. This reality ought to encourage these countries to control their growth rate.

4 Let's take the example of Tunisia's efforts in regulating its population growth. Its programme is very rational. Consequently, the growth rate is currently at 1.9%, down from 3.1% around the late 1950's. However, these positive results should serve as a stimulus to achieve even better ones, to enable the country to guarantee all of its citizens a decent and comfortable life.
