SECTION ONE : READING COMPREHENSION (07 pts)

Read the passage carefully then do the activities.

Should companies such as Adidas or Reebok advertise their highly-styled and highly-priced sneakers to young people (especially black teenagers) who can't afford to buy them unless they are selling drugs? Should black heroes like film-maker Spike Lee and basketball player Michael Jordan participate in advertisements for these products when they know that some teenagers want the shoes they promote so much that they will kill for them?

These questions are at the centre of a debate that has been ranging in the United States for the recent years. In a country known for its consumerism, athletic shoes have driven the youth mad. Although an average pair of athletic shoes costs approximately 100 dollars, many teenagers wear one pair for only two or five weeks before replacing it with a new pair.

Where's the money coming from? The answer is drugs. Few teenagers can afford to buy a 100 dollars pair of sneakers every month unless they are making money selling drugs without any parental control.
